The vast majority of [Mexican] wine production (about 85%) occurs in the state of Baja California, which is just a smidgen north of the 30° latitude line. The region benefits from the cooling breezes of the Pacific Ocean.

There are over 150 wineries in the Baja Peninsula, and the number is growing. Most are fairly small scale operations, bottling under 100,000 cases annually. The Mediterranean climate, morning fog from the Pacific, and valley topography feel pretty similar to parts of California. The major wine-making sub-regions here including Valle de Guadalupe, Valle de Calafia, Valle de San Vincente, and Valle de Santo Tomás, are characterized by granite-rich alluvial soils – attributes you might expect to find in the Northern Rhône Valley of France.

Some have dubbed Valle de Guadalupe the “Napa Valley of Mexico.”
